Dear Readers

Dear reader,

Clive Barker, in his novel The Thief of Always, wrote, “The great grey beast of February had eaten Harvey Swick alive.” What unfolds against the backdrop of winter’s last gasp is Harvey’s panoply of discovery and discord. In this issue, Maddening the Sacred Eulogy, we hope you find yourself initiated into your own journey through the end of Winter into Spring.

Santino DallaVecchia
Editor
Staff

Editor-in-Chief
Santino DallaVecchia

Assistant Editor
Elizabeth Webb

Editorial Intern
Erica Krol

Public Relations Editor
Allyson Hubbell

Web Editor and Layout Designer
Elizabeth Webb

Staff Writer
John Urdiales
Writing

There’s a bump in the floor
by Elizabeth Austin
page 5

Three More Reasons
by Karli Henning
page 6

Traditions
by Karli Henning
page 7

Father
by Taylor Card
page 10

It’s April and Our Knuckles Are Cold
by Angela Williams
page 11

Hydrologic
by Eric Morris-Pusey
page 12

Extinction of the Planet
by Daniel de Cullá
page 13

Because of St. Kevin and the Blackbird
by Angela Williams
page 15

Stalemate
by Eric Morris-Pusey
page 16

Dancing with My Lass to Elvis Costello by John Rybicki
page 17

Front Doors
by Daniel de Cullá
page 20

Because of St. Kevin and the Blackbird
by Angela Williams
page 21
Jack
   by Elizabeth Austin   page 22

Mental Illness ABC's by Karli Henning     page 23

Nicole
   by Taylor Card      page 24

Sway
   by Elizabeth Austin  page 26

On a Piece of Paper You Were About to Burn by John Rybicki      page 27 Artwork

Cover:
Twist of Innocence
  by Ellen Miller

Growing or dying?
  by Domenica DallaVecchia     page 8 Twisted crossroad
  by Domenica DallaVecchia     page 9
Water and It’s Sky
  by Domenica DallaVecchia     page 14
Twinkle, Twinkle, little Lake
  by Domenica DallaVecchia     page 19 Twilight through the trees
  by Domenica DallaVecchia     page 25
There's a bump in the floor
by Elizabeth Austin

A tree has slowly grown Up through our house, Arching the floorboards Cracking plaster with its boughs.
This tree pushed its way into the living room,
On the floor below,
Starting as a small curve of rug That we stumbled over-Until one day it burst through,
Splintering the wood floors, Green leaves pushing upwards Desperate for light.
This tree hoisted the coffee table up Along with the high-backed wing chair-Now we're sipping tea in its limbs As it climbs higher and higher, Up to my bedroom
To burst through the roof And eventually its branches will shatter the glass of the windows, blow the doors out completely and we'll live in the limbs, swinging ourselves through burgeoning jade.
Three More Reasons
by Karli Henning

I
your eyes
blue like the surface of frozen rivers flecks of ice flecks of white

II
your eyes
blue like
the tips of campfire flames melt my hands light my night

III
your eyes
blue like blood through winter skin where my blood goes at your touch
Traditions

by Karli Henning

It was the last weekend of November in a little-better-than-dive bar and we sipped on spiked coffee instead of beer while we waited for the fireworks show to begin above the state capital building. The creamy drinks were lukewarm at best but they thawed our fingertips and the small but growing conversation.

My father always drove us two towns over to pick out the highest quality Christmas tree during the last weekend of November not because he loved to play lumberjack tour guide but because it meant two more hours with three happy daughters, hot chocolate upholstery stains and a million pine needles in his backseat.

I am buying another round as a Christmas gift to all of you! shouted one friend who never got a chance because the soft thud of the first firework shook the bar windows. It was a signal for us to re-bundle and shuffle out onto the sidewalk to scope out a spot to tilt our raw pink faces to the sky.

The explosions drowned out murmuring carols from citywide speakers. The violent blasts of gunpowder mixed with humming bells and the sporadic lights against black clouds made me close my eyes to see a dance of red particles. There was a sudden wave of gasps and I knew the tree was lit.

Eyes still closed, I pictured roots bursting from the bottom of the Christmas tree shaped like the arms of fireworks, dripping flecks of gold. They reached all the way to an old farm on a dirt road two towns away in the last weekend of November.
Growing or dying?

by Domenica Dalla Vecchia
Twisted crossroad
by Domenica Dalla Vecchia
DNA never needed to Stockholm Syndrome me into anything.
If I truly had to tell you why I’ll always love him, It would come down to a rainy day and a yellow dress stained blue with forget-me-nots.

I’m four when God pulls the plug from his bathtub ‘cause the water’s gone lukewarm and lost its steam.
It drains for hours and hours onto our driveway but it’s almost summer and I’ve fallen in love with kissing tulip bulbs and dancing for sunsets.

So we go out to get massaged by endless bathwater Kiss all the pink tulips and the rare red ones twice for luck and he forgets how to be embarrassed.
When the sun goes down, I can’t stop smiling;

we’re dancing in our driveway in the pouring rain.
It’s April and Our Knuckles Are Cold
by Angela Williams

In the rain my love and I scour the gravel pit for fossils. We sift and scan, searching for freshwater coral, paw through layers to see what slid down in the slick. Clay seeps under our nails, into our skins. Our feet dig in and brace us against the wind.

When the sky clears we drive to the dam for the first steelhead trout of the season.
Nothing is jumping. It is still too cold for them to come up river to spawn.
The rail at the look-out is soaked from fast water—river risen from melt-off and rain.

Drupes of sumac berries, red torches against the grey sky—easy to mistake for fat cardinals, their feathers matted against the wind. Now we walk down to the riverbank. I pinch off a clump of sumac and grind it against my palm.
Its red spice recalls from childhood, a bloody nose bitten by the wind.
It is just too cold to breathe.

My love will work on his truck in the barn until dark. He’ll use everything under the sink to clean his hands. Spray his life and heart lines raw. Late, when he wants to touch, his hands will be dry as the stag-horn sumac at the woods’ edge behind my father’s house.
His nails are sanded smooth, round as the moon in the golden sky of his eyes, a halo as honest as the day’s work he’ll already have put in.

When I was a kid my father kept the snowplow on his truck until May. We’d drive back to the woods.
He’d curse the sumac, then he’d lower the plow and hit the gas, uprooting as many trees as he could on a run.
Their branches flew like antlers in rut. Then he’d back up, rev the v-8, hit the gas, do it again, and laugh like hell.
Grandfather snaps photos with his Nikon D5500.
Everyone hasn’t been together like this since the last funeral.
The camera is heavy and black as Jimmy’s coffin lid, and when I watch Grandfather change its lens it is not unlike seeing him load a pistol.

Droplets hang on the points of umbrellas like ripe fruit aching to fall, to swell the rivulets and puddles that keep soil soft for the gravediggers. Where will I meet the next person I love? Perhaps beneath a streetlamp a winter or two from now, each falling snowflake burning as it catches the light.

And where will we be parted? I’d catch one of the specks in my tiny hand, hold it to my lips, and ask, but surely my breath would kill it. The stars will hide behind clouds and the halo cast by the town’s lights, offering no answers. When someone catches me and lays me in the spread of earth the rain has softened for me, the rivers that stream and steam down that someone’s face will feed towering oaks and fill the deepest oceans in worlds our eyes will never dream of seeing.

Extinction of the Planet

by Daniel de Cullá

We laugh at first Excerpt from a Journey of blood and tears When Songs of Love and Maps of Freedom Have undertaken to be revealed And only are correspondences, notes Quotes as wave lengths.
Sun rods into mountains Hearing thrshh thrshh from the tress Rotting nebulae.
Moon rides rivers
Just being able to pick and go Objective characteristics To the observance of geophysics.
Are we seeing our extinction?
Voices-- human crying Voices-animal, voices-plant
But the Planet cannot sleep a wink Bushing over the stream.
Voice-Life of Earth lives And we laugh at first Again. The same.
Because of St. Kevin and the Blackbird
by Angela Williams

Near Glendalough, Ireland a cave is bitten into the apple of a hill with room enough to lie there and listen to the stars.
Perhaps you can reach out to wish them goodnight.
While you’re reaching out of sight, if a blackbird lands on your hand, draw it back in and fashion a bed from what you come across in the dark—what can comfort, what can hold.
If you find nothing, fold your other hand over the blackbird and its three eggs, now laid, cupping it as you make your way downhill through bramble and stony piles, to the woods.
Stop there then among the trees, while your breath catches up to you. Under the canopy of oaks, you will find leaves to fold into a nest so your hand is freed of progeny—their flight imagined in early dreams.
Tears and snow leave unattractive stains on your cheeks, so you move to the desert.

Only the dead speak so far from the cold city lights, and even the dead are usually silent. When they do find a voice, it is only their bones rattling, not endless jawing in bars or lecture halls or under bright election banners.

There is no rhetoric in the desert because there is nothing in the desert. The phone lines, the spindly cell towers struggle to stretch their arms so wide.

When I call from back East, we can hardly speak. Do I understand why you left?

There is so much bright pain here under the lights. Click and whoosh, you light a cigarette before you say, “I’ve washed off all the soot the city left on me.” My laugh is not quite bitter when I tell you the tobacco was packed under North Carolina factory fluorescence.

The call is dropped. I bite my lip. Do you sit, listening to the song the wind sings streaming through naked ribcages stripped of all that made them so dirty, so noble?
First night alone in the new apartment.
The spirits draw up from the hard things of this world. The oak floor and trim, even the walls warm to malleable, wrap themselves like a shawl around my animal.
I put on some Elvis Costello and shape my arms to hold Julie’s form, as if she were there in the hollow under my chin. Is it Elvis or some acoustic angel sprinkling my love’s spirit near her man, who leans his pillars from foot to foot, his palm gripping no more than the apparition of her baby-bald head?

*

They say that grief is a tidal wave and when it hits it staggers me to the living room floor. I kneel and hold my hand to the distance the way my love did every time she’d chalk away over the stones in our driveway, turn signal winking left so the squirrels and such would know which way she was going. She’d curl onto the blacktop and squeal the brakes, jut her arm out the car window, her hand straining to drag the arm almost out by its socket and fly her back to me.

Were those bracelets, or little bells of cancer jingling along her arms?
My lass and I were citizens of that magnification. We were blood tulips. Wreaths laced with ribbons circled each of our throats as I stood there in my socks on our cement slab porch, replicating the gesture, willing my arm to tear out by its root and chase after her. Julie would ease off the brakes at the apex of our little world and let gravity take her. She’d surrender downhill to that river sweeping her toward her own death. Sometimes I’d cry or she’d cry around the bend to the elements, “I love you, Dude, I love you, Dude,” her voice always softer the second time with distance.
Twinkle, Twinkle, little Lake
by Domenica Dalla Vecchia Baby O dynamite mistress of the Star fish swimming in my ears where often a Wo/Man remains alone long to listen

Doors singing my business daily dead as a door nail into all this Channel

O.O. % Ecstasy. No!

showing me a door opening by itself at the End of lives forgotten when Sun is a dog cart botted with gay dogs of the dooms day

sit and dreaming of the floor of our nothingness sentencing:

“Baker’s dozen talk

19 to the dozen”.

Front" Doors

by Daniel de Cullà
Because of St. Kevin and the Blackbird
by Angela Williams

You’ll need to clean your closet now they’re the first and only words to fall out.

I close my eyes and can see his thirty collared shirts next to my worn robe with the pink roses.

I can see the door handle holding an orange jacket a bit unconventional but his favorite color.

Under a pile of clean slacks on the floor I know there’s a book I told him to read

And on the top shelf housing fresh dust letter filled with words like always.
Upon waking from his nap, he flings his bedroom door open to an empty split-level landing and despairs, “No one missed Jack!”

I have taken to listening for him in the afternoons, waiting for his feet to patter across the wood floor—he’s up!

I lay myself along the light of the door’s jamb like a carpet, an old toy waiting for him to come and play:

for him to come and play: his adoring and only mother, telling him, I am here.
I have been waiting for you all along.
Anxiety is a snake of caring tightening around your ribs baking a cake for the neighbor’s ex-wife’s birthday crystalizing your plans to take a shower Depression is getting your foot caught in mud and lying down escaping a party to wonder if God exists forgetting to pay bills and pretending it matters Growing up with both is skipping across broken beer bottles hanging “glass half-full” reminders on the bathroom mirror imploding with doubt when you forget to feed the cat justifying three hours spent scheduling on Sundays killing silence with sitcoms and laugh-tracks loving to consume and consuming to love missing your therapist like a family member noticing the couch has moved three inches to the left opening old wounds and pouring in soy sauce perfecting the act of acting perfectly normal quickening heart rates and slowing productivity reliving your fifth grade spelling bee surviving, but not living twitching fingers and bloody cuticles understanding that you’ll never understand anything visiting your grandparents because time’s running out wondering if you will ever finish anything She was so alive that at times the death-craving would come to her Little pulses of risk it and wildness that would twitch her bones and prick at her blood, edging her up and out of the house The song that played the skies was a flash photo taken in a darkroom and the thunder deep a door slammed as her bare toes lipped through the grass to the street

There she laid down across two lanes and trembled with terrible happiness I could do nothing else but lie down next to her and witness Rain melted her curls into indistinguishable asphalt rivers
The light coming towards us, steadier than the strobing flashes all around I heard a car cry out
I honked at her to move

But it was too late She soaked into the pavement lightning struck and she was forged in unmovable memory Twilight through the trees
by Domenica Dalla Vecchia I turn in circles, my daughter balanced softly on the tops of my feet. We’re dancing to the slow, sad music I listen to when I can’t focus on any one thing and the only way to hurt less is to hurt more first. I think this is what dying is—swaying, rocking gently from foot to foot, arms out, twirling at the hand of whatever will eventually twist you into itself, hold you tight to its chest and shift at the hips, a mouth near your ear and a hand on your waist, like dancing only you’re not dancing, you’re closing your eyes and there’s no floor below you, only space to fall, and there’s quiet, so much quiet it’s a pleasure.
Never needing to hurt, never having to feel life peal by while you sprint to catch up.
No one’s breaking your heart, and there’s no worry for the future, no nagging past. It’s just a fist closing around a flame, a beat that slows in tempo until all that’s left is echo, and echo fades to black.
How do you hold the dead when they’re hammered into a room so flat you can pick your teeth with one corner of the picture? When you were the one at that moment aiming the cheap camera wanting to fold her light into a square locket of time.
You could see Noah’s ark and the earth, all the light in the world concentrated in her brown eyes.

The Dixie Chicks were playing “Cowboy Take Me Away,” and that didn’t hurt your cause.
But now that she’s a crumb inside the earth, the song punches little whispery nail holes in the bottom of your boat so the fountain sends its fine mist raining up.

You rock on the kitchen floor hugging your own legs, weeping and kissing a face so tiny you could cover it with a penny.

You repeat the same prayer to her over and over, as if your heart were the governor on death’s engine.
How could God smash a room flat into a photo and do it over and over again?

She’s standing in the doorway to your bedroom in that apartment you came home to after your I do’s.
Soon she’ll peel off her shirt for bedtime shivering even before you drive the needle into her arm.
You miss the bird’s nest made of hair on your dresser, the kissing and kissing her baby-bald head when you were young and in love with as much blood as rain pouring out of your shoes.

*

My lass and I were citizens of that magnification.
We were blood tulips. Wreaths laced with ribbons circled each of our throats as I stood there in my socks on our cement slab porch, replicating the gesture, willing my arm to tear out by its root and chase after her. Julie would ease off the brakes at the apex of our little world and let gravity take her.
She’d surrender downhill to that river sweeping her toward her own death. Sometimes I’d cry or she’d cry around the bend to the elements, “I love you, Dude, I love you, Dude,” her voice always softer the second time with distance.

Previously appeared in John Rybicki’s When All the World Was Old Spotlight Piece
External Verifications that Your Doppelgänger is Stalking You by John Urdiales

People say I look like their friends, their brothers, sons, dead husbands. I would not know what to do if I ran into myself. It would be as if looking into a mirror, but wearing different clothes and perhaps slightly variant glasses—or no glasses at all—and a swaggering stride which I might find overtly aberrant. What would I do? What would I say? Would words even be necessary? How might I prevent a row, a scene in the street? Would the hand of God descend from the clouds and pick one of us up to prevent some catastrophic event from happening—an event which He has always-already ordained by allowing such an encounter? Would I even believe in God? Might I, in fact, play the harp? Would I orchestrate melodies of rich undertones without having a conception of the soul? without having a clear identity of mind, body, spirit? Would I have a spirit? I would have spirits bountiful enough to live in ecstasy—perhaps ecstasy, too, and other inhibitors of hallucinogenic transformation. And would I live in an imaginary setting, filled with the wonders of material love, of a love so free it could not be chained, could not be understood by the roving masses? Perhaps the moon might crash into the earth, into this comfy, cozy town; or might the governing political bodies break into civil war? Would life be worth living after such an abominable confrontation? Would I remember how to pray, how to think, or how to read, to write, to sing or how to dance? No—perhaps reality would crumble, would find itself in a situation where nothing could continue as it always-already is, was, will come to be. ‘I’ would no longer exist: only ‘we’. Then again—he might have great taste in music and coffee.